

30th ANNIVERSARY EDITION

CRISES OF REJUVENATION

BARBARA A.
HOLLAND

CRISES OF REJUVENATION

Third Edition, Revised
With Notes by Brett Rutherford

THE POET'S PRESS
Providence, RI
2006

Copyright © 1973, 1975, 1986, 2006 by The Poet's Press
All Rights Reserved

Book design by Brett Rutherford

This is the 162nd publication of
THE POET'S PRESS
65 Hope Street
Providence, RI 02906
ISBN 0-XXXX-XX-X
www.thepoetspress.org

This book is also published in Adobe Acrobat (PDF) format.

CONTENTS

Personal Values	9
Crises of Rejuvenation	10
Rhetorician!	11
Good Morning	12
Rags of Omen	13
Louder Than Life	14
An Abominable Breakfast	16
Intimations	17
A Street Throughout The Years	18
Vernal Equinox	20
Not Nice At All!	21
My Old Friend, The Sorcerer	22
Who Goes First?	23
Who Says	24
The Best of All Possible Worlds	25
Rag Picker	26
The Inevitable Knife	27
High On Three Cups of Tea	28
As One Possessed	29
The Breaker	30
Autumn Wizard	31
Midnight On The Esplanade	32
Close Call for The Secret Agent	34
The Retractable Booby-Trap	35
Not Now, Wanderer	36
Take Flight to Montreal!	38
The Itinerant Window	39
Before the Beginning	40
A Covering Letter	41
Entrance Of Origins	42
Apports	43
Not Fungus, No, Never That!	44
Schuykill Weather	45
Imagine Your Guitar	46
The Raucous Hour	47
The Evening Fish	48
So There, Descartes!	49
Subway Exit	50
Suspense for Days	51
Strike Two	52
Sustained Enchantment	53
The Sound of The Tinkling Cymbals	54
In The Cause of Justice	55
A Cup of Coffee	56
The Iron Urge	57
A Tryst Beneath a Bird House	58
The Blight	59
Home Can Be Anywhere	61
Some Day A Sudden Craving	63
The Brain Walks Close Behind	64

Ancestral Vision	65
This Certain Quaintness	66
Keeping The Window Closed	67
The Summer's Final Season	68
The Capricorn Tapestry	70
The Lodger	72
Shadow Faker	73
Aquila	74
Companions	76
The Sorcerer's Moon	77
Sky Hanger	78
Advance Upon Canaan	79
Leavings	81
The Listening Room	83
Where Will It All Begin?	84
The Watcher Awakened	85
Cat's Cradle	86
Water Baby	87
My Cousin In Vertical Orbit	88
You Never Notice	89
Optical Illusions	90
Enough Of This	91
Bad Company	92
It Must Be A Joke	93
Windfall	94
Down Meadow Slope	95
End Of An Era	96
Southward Running	98
Vandalism	99
Another Season	100
The Privileged Moments: Publishing Barbara A. Holland	101

CRISES OF REJUVENATION

PERSONAL VALUES

Bent to right angles, the living sky hurries its continuity of clouds across the room;

Around it, along side of it, dreams of the fever of stars.

If the mirror is honest, somewhere in the neverland behind the observer a starched gauntness of window intimates that outer other, more living, more desperate, more spontaneous and daring than the wind course of wall paper recently bent and organized to house disproportionate tidiness in domesticated freedom and raising its regimented altitudes against the greater of the two unknowns.

CRISES OF REJUVENATION

*I am repatriated in a moment of panic.
These are the privileged moments that transcend mediocrity."
--Rene Magritte*

I am seized from behind by my homeland in a moment of panic, when places are exchanged and the rhythms of life reversed, when names and the objects which they had previously owned, divorce for other partners, when wood rasps granular like stone, and rocks river grain throughout their lasting stolidity; in a grasp of gravity when rain hangs suspended like tons of hair, loosed by dried clouds upon deterioration, or when the third story window of a mansion shudders implacable blue from untenanted rooms and a subsequent low rumble escapes down the garden beneath the grass.

These are the privileged moments, transfiguring size and enlarging color to accommodate sky and ocean. These are the moments that transcend mediocrity.

RHETORICIAN!

One morning, just about this time last summer, he died, conclusively and clinched his argument.

GOOD MORNING

You knocked me out this morning; with a flash fist you cracked my skull wide open to the sunlight, then edged yourself from between its parted halves, disheveled by your laughter at the wince I was.

I crawled down into the reassurance of the coffee pot from which you poured my murk through your reflection.

RAGS OF OMEN

A warm, firm grasp of your hand on a night when the winter dances on the rim of your ear.

A cousin grip assuring your shoulder of gemmed realities yet to come.

End of hair against your cheek as scarcely tangible and almost as unendurably intimate as breath.

Rags of ambiguous omen streaming from a stranger's hedge.

LOUDER THAN LIFE

Staking out stance and taking,
with their cushioned hoists, curved segments of transportation, by nailing their claim to sidewalks for no one's weight, this partnership of crutches, now adopted siblings to no discernible leg, acquires and abandons distances to no one's aid in any unusual hour past midnight in deserted streets.

There
 past the filling station There,
stabbing their raucous round of corner, two simultaneous uprights in double tilt of giant steps, as if a man between them were flung across a now, reached inward from the future, which is instantly obsolete;

were flung again, but no one hangs between them.

The crutches stab their stride then swing, then stab again.

Suppose a man,

despite the absence of any human agency!

These crutches are out on their own, this time by whim impelled through any neighborhood of night.

Suppose a grip on handholds.
These crutches are synchronized, louder than life and faster.

AN ABOMINABLE BREAKFAST

My eyes plough my minestrone, seeking an alternative to being bruised against your iron face.

Your scowl hangs like a soaked and dripping sheet, grudgingly releasing filthy water which dents the table top before it turns to scum.

You hoard your thunder by the ton. No drop leaf was ever intended to support such silences as yours which squats where wood is weakest, sniffing at our barrier of boredom. Passionate boredom, like a sweater which a dozen years has colonized throughout with burrs, stiffens until the first growth of conversation comes up stubble; at each glimpse recapturing the long horse face of obstinate delusion, and hisses like a useless faucet.

INTIMATIONS

Not as the disc face of the incessant sky, caught in the curve of horns that harbor the miracle of harp strings, would I deny you the vast moor of my love.

Nor as the tremor, still rumoring the long gong of countless acquaintances, can I dip less of you from air than sound and strain you through the skeletons of leaves, for now the twilight whinnies and the stars creak on their axes, now the fish, feathered through from spine within to tufted scales without, swims among chimneys, a victim for ventilators.

It is a long swallow in the throat of the past that gags on the lie of distance and your absence. A mirror swings between that serpent's eyes, flinging some little of my face before you, to warn you that a keyhole may capture your timelessness and guard it for my homeward passage.

A STREET THROUGHOUT THE YEARS

This street is always with me without change.

Never has anyone been visible on sidewalks drained by the moonlight of their breathing.

Row on row of brownstone shafts are lifted in unison, each slotted with a glass that takes outside and throws it back rather than announcing inside.

Glints experiment with paneling, burn knobs, awaking nothing.

The doors cringe in the depths of alcoves, lurked like cowled figures in single blocks, self hugged to shrink within a narrowness, pledged to be vigilant with eyes alone.

The street tenses.
in response to waiting.
 Always ahead
 there is that door, that molding half transformed into a column which cannot hide a luminescence bright enough to be a faint glow existing this side of suggestion.

As I watch, it grows, intensifies sufficiently to bathe the steps, but suddenly I find myself elsewhere, the street gone.

The next time I am here I am a half block off, approaching.

VERNAL EQUINOX

I used your absence up; no day of it was wasted.

When, at the first, it raised its granite vastness as a cliff that faced my daily door,

I wrote a sentence on it which I never let you read.

Nor could you ever; your return erased it.

I cannot quote it now, but after it was written there, the whole cliff quivered through its width in drift of curtain.

That was when it first began to shale off flakes the size of store-front window panes, the day I first installed my window, the day the rock wept slabs of rain.

NOT NICE AT ALL!

I am not safe here.

I am not safe anywhere

while you treat your elsewhere brooding to my least commendable thoughts, or those that ought to be too youthful to saddle language, but which nevertheless are always the first to hobble home just as you want them —

naked!

MY OLD FRIEND, THE SORCERER

I could sit here almost forever, watching the dormer window of the tall house on the ridge issue a flight of clouds.

Some bulge slowly through the squeeze of frame, fretted by the roughened wood. Some ooze and fray, straggle and fall apart in shreds. Some clot and obstruct the window until activated by a shove.

Some sail forth languidly like flotillas of immaculate ironing boards.

Some puff in bounce to freedom with sooted bottoms, but the kick dies after the window has done with them, and all that is left is the long climb upward into the herd and across the meadows.

And how the fields bruise with them under reiteration of interrupted heat! I too, wherever I am, in slow pace of assurance, steadied instantly,

for he has to be in there, grinding out clouds — my old friend, the sorcerer — the sly one!

WHO GOES FIRST?

Your clothes hide precious little of your armor of ivory. Probably you are unaware of the netting of veins that runs through it. Right now, I note the trembling of newly sprouted leaves, parting a crevice all along your arm, in twinkle from your shoulder to your wrist.

A soft whip of forsythia has just uncoiled and risen from your collar to annoy your ear, No, you are not a liar. You are numb, so habit plated that the lick of truth will never touch your cheek, nor will the damp weight of the scent of lilacs encumber you.

You stand too straight, sit with the inclination of your spine as focus for meditation, walk shod in quandaries of chamoix, and occasionally reproach me for never removing these linked gloves of nerves which have driven my rings into ruts of accustomed bruises. A grape fall of lilac invades your eyes. I see it, but refuse to sniff. I smell it, but turn my head away.
My face is stamped on the reverse side of the coin of caution which I give you, shoving its small chill under your plate as a fit bribe for your skittish mercy.

WHO SAYS

Who crunches cellophane inside my head and wakes me:

Who sets fire to the silence with a sentence of no possible relevance, which hangs there, smouldering,

but soundless,

and which clings for days in the curtains?

“Who?”

I cry out to the listening all around me.

They call me crazy.

THE BEST OF ALL POSSIBLE WORLDS

A stone, fitted to the grasp for throwing, was kicked from the beach and hurled high over crests of breakers, and out of context into larger experience,
 and stuck there,
dipping and lifting on the buoyancy of air, blistering from hide of granite along the line of sky to shape of piel towers, keep and walls, in outgrowth of Basque perversity
and stuck there,

a parasitic nucleus of armed nobility, perched on the brow of a mountainous boulder, at perilous threat to shipping as the monstrous weight lowered to the slap of spray, or shot up smartly, hoisted to the race of clouds
 and stuck there on updraught of pride on diabolic insolence, keeping court coeval with reality
 —and stuck there.

RAG PICKER

There you go, hung from whatever support keeps you dangled to scuff of feet that drag to the weight of the shadow they tow behind them.

Then why is your neck worn out with your head?
And why do you gnaw reluctantly on a knuckle that you never really liked?

Suppose you had to haul your image about as I do, and that includes your shadow as well as the droop in the slouch that casts it!

I have strained against the worst laggards there are in the junkyards of imagery, and I have never gone on a diet of fingers. I need them to repair their shadows.

THE INEVITABLE KNIFE

I must look incredibly foolish.

You will have to admit that a handle midway between the shoulder blades seems curious.

I know it's there. I feel it; the humiliating wag of it in bend of steel to weight of handle; the glint of metal yet unburied, triumphant in the wink of stealth; the chill of ice edge encroaching on the sovereignty of spine, and the nausea, just as it always has been, in the tempting availability of a useful excrescence for any type of push or pull, and as it always will be.

I can never get used to it.

HIGH ON THREE CUPS OF TEA

Street lights drown in wine. The ambered dark breathes an unpeopled festivity, as if the city had been recently deserted by a circus that left the lights on.

This has been but the end of a day of it.

Five persons, whose faces had never been anything more than basically facial came down with serious cases of beautiful eyes.

I was embarrassed.

A warehouse appeared as a Venetian palace. A limp banana lily languished on the lip of a garbage can and I, an occasional iconoclast, stood breathless before the perfection of a parking meter.

Now,
 I go home to delight in the cracks in my ceiling while the light outside my window rinses layers of grime on glass with claret.

AS ONE POSSESSED

Any time that you did not splurge by staring at blank paper seemed to be wasted, for the pressure persisted, nagging between your ears, or grabbing you by the spine and shaking you. Sleep came and went, but blotted none of it

And so the words were pinched, twisted, stretched and worried; forced through a hole in your forehead, which widened with their girth, and everything rocked, limped, staggered and sagged; flesh from spectral insufficiency which made no sense in the flesh or out of it. You could not forget it.

That was forbidden, but if you insisted on scratching at it, you broke your nails, and then your fingers. If it died to forget you, it stole a birth from you to be remembered.

THE BREAKER

In the grasp of a wave you were gone;
by a wave flung back.

Where are you?

After the wave withdrew the beach was wet with stars.

But now the stars are dried and you are out of reach.

Speak to me from all the many voices in this whispering sand.

Somewhere the sun must find you.

AUTUMN WIZARD

for Ray Bradbury

When he fed your adolescence on the youth of his poems, do you remember his fireplace releasing his personal Octobers in sendings of unusual leaves; that they were crimson, indigo, coral and turquoise when they streamed a spiral from the hearth grate out and once around him on their long glide to the ceiling?

Do you remember that his house was a gaunt spinster with a rhomboid eye browed under angle of a gable; that the raw dawns of the crows had galled its clapboards?

He was a poet then, as thin and angular as his house, and of a desperate season, when the sky screams and the clouds become impulsive. Not for all his summers has its bite diminished, even when the green-up hit him and his wallet swelled with May.

He has been poet still, despite the blockage of a moveable screen.
The Autumn stuffs the yawning of the fireplace and the flue packs solid.
The screen is a wall of gems, but even so, he sometimes removes it and the room is brawl of burst October when the crush crumbles and the whole belch of it charges the dining room door. Then he burrows through the heap of his poems for air while his house leans on the wind.

MIDNIGHT ON THE ESPLANADE

You have propped your conservatism on the rail of a bridge. Bright smudges of lights awaken only a glimmer in cufflinks; not the sharp burst from unclouded metal in response to the glare from spike-crowned lamps, sided with glass, but minor luminescences from smears of gold.

It is no night to wink manic with cufflinks, but one which molds chimeric monsters above the huddled houses in the street below; a night that dances on cheekbones with swarms of microscopic feet, a night that wads traffic in cotton batting, and no night at all for an off-duty businessman, who carelessly raises prodigious wings from the shoulders of a tuxedo, to allow his faultless tailoring to soak through, and his plumage to mat to a near slime, packed tight against the back of his coat.

But, nevertheless, there you are, prodding at brittle financial considerations, and drowning your face in fog, while first one wing and then another, loosens under moisture and shakes free a bit of cramp from the discipline of muscles.

Feathers lift and ruffle down currents of gloss. An impetuous flounce stacks a side of sleekness against the dullness of serge.
There is no alteration of your expression, or shift of your hands. And your lion, successfully trained in Yoga, lies less impatiently on the coolness of the flagging behind you than either of your wings on your cogitations, and awaits his enlightenment and your decision to continue with your long walk home.

CLOSE CALL FOR THE SECRET AGENT

The tiny quintets of toes that had spattered the parapet, as if after intermittent catfalls during the preceding night, disquieted investigators, who wondered why they were indelible, what type of marking substance had etched them there, and what sort of night had happened anyhow.

If anyone had told them of the correct gentleman in the impeccable suit, who had walked up and down the length of those neatly fitted segments of granite, folded tightly in upon himself with the severity of a furred umbrella, and who had tapped out his impatience with the tips of his fingers on the rock, as if the gray of it had barely clouded the keyboards of several petrified typewriters they would have paid no attention at all, but if they had heard the slightest suggestion of fingerprints, left there by the secret agent, they would have had those blocks rooted up, hoisted, crated and trucked off somewhere for insatiable testing and, like as not, would have lost a whole police force in a man-hunt for the secret agent, whose only crime had been the temporary dislocation of an aspect of cultural faith.

They were not told. The timely intervention of a sparrow easily distracted them.
The infuriating spots soon vanished.

THE RETRACTABLE BOOBY-TRAP

After scraping myself from the asphalt, after prodding

a mutinous hip,

after brushing off and straightening up my dignity, after stuffing my embarrassment back in my purse,

I searched both curb and gutter for the thing that tripped me.

It was a dog, of course, now three blocks hence, strayed again from his human, tightening his hawser straight across the sidewalk at the height of shin.

Effective as a booby-trap with retractable evidence.

How many pedestrians did you tumble today?
How many limping gaits proclaim your outing?

NOT NOW, WANDERER

Evening by evening your shadow lengthens, but with this Autumn, as with others past, it is a lie.

Never does it lengthen sufficiently to fall on me.
Never does the dark grasp at the end of your reach fasten upon me and lift me to the crags where you stand guard and listen to my waiting.

Still, the high howl of my hunger for you swoops, a lost bird, between your messenger ravens.
I walk at night, expecting their brush of blackness across my cheek, but no feather of them tells me by contact that you are nearer.

Not now, Old One. Not at any other now do I need you less than in previous Autumns, for the familiar and delectable tearing in the ring of my pelvis and the hot cloud fattening under my ribs, merge with the leaves' urgency and the moon's tight-fisted tension.

With this suspense and the concentration of desire, I make my instrument of destruction and creation.
When Time shall bring my arms above and around the granite of your shoulders, and I am lost in the folds of your cloak; my waiting assuaged in the cavern left vacant by your eye beneath your hat brim, my extension will shorten, my aim will quirk, my concentration will sputter and the old work of will and incantation will dry up, forgotten.

I need you, but even more than that, the need for you. Love, lust, or the inevitable conquest by thunderbolt, penetration by cast of lightning on the bare slopes browning above the fever of foliage:

our predestined collision and the coiled sleep in the crater of your vacant eye must be withheld as many years have kept them pocketed for the conservation of power.

Your beard gathers grayness. Your face hardens with the weather as thunder rehearses its yearly promises among the hills. Somewhere beyond a number of Autumns, or even beyond all Autumns ever, you will become a receptacle for my remnants, pieced, at the last, among your bones.

Wait, Wanderer, till then.

Not now!

TAKE FLIGHT TO MONTREAL!

Do you know what that tentacle, now weaving itself through the slats of your fire escape, has done for the front of your building?

(It has not adorned it!)

that when the citrus slant of early sunlight illuminates it from underneath, when lifted,
and catches the pallor of its suckers wide-eyed, cabs slew broadside to the traffic and squad cars settle single file across the street?

I suppose that whatever pours it like a viscid dripping from one of your open casements was installed in your fourth floor loft to frighten burglars, but nevertheless you could have encouraged whatever it is to hoist its excess yardage inside even if you balked at arranging its removal or an adequate explanation.

You had better plan on a long and immediate vacation in Montreal.

THE ITINERANT WINDOW

High on the night the slow drift of your windows southward with frequent idling pauses.

The long reach of brilliance sizzling upwards from the grass dazzles over sill and downwards.

 Today, lodged accidentally in oak boughs, onyx caught out startled in the leaves winds tossing lozenges of glass about;

tonight, perhaps,
 a strong gust unloading a lead-crossed rectangle, and nudging it once more across the dark, suddenly switched on by laughter.

BEFORE THE BEGINNING

A poem clots like storm accumulating above a headland.

Where space so recently was deep blue breathing,

a huddle of inquisitive giants match the power of competitive shoulders, each trying to be the first to catch a glimpse of me.

I hurry to the beach before the rain begins to break in braille against the sand.

A COVERING LETTER

Dear Editors:

I am sending you five rocks.
They are overstatements of weight; too solid to stare into immediate dust; too quick with pyrite and quartz to be tedious, yet sufficiently conglomerate to confuse you, if you are normal;

too much given to erratic winking to leave you in peace; infusible, insoluble and entirely untractable, but just vivid enough to make a vague blur out of anything you choose to set beside them.

If you reject them, you will be ridding yourselves of the five best items for keeping other people's poems from blowing away, of the five items best suited for throwing through the windows of the Ford Foundation, and if you keep them, you had better not forget to make them available for public inspection, because, if left unused, they rot, and in so doing, they are radioactive.

ENTRANCE OF ORIGINS

Your face clears, and the rock behind stands out. A long swathe of your cheek has worn to granite. A crackling of mica flakes beneath your eye, and the bald smoothness of a boulder has burnished a subtle curve of cheek bone. Above the ledge beneath your eye moss drips a green stain, from a yellow arch, which leaks through fissures at the corners, and drains off, eating more cheek away until the harsh grain and the scab of lichen emphasize the gouge that writes parenthesis to nose and mouth. Slowly your face disintegrates and terminal moraine erupts, complete, unaltered and frighteningly alive.

APPORTS

Shadows of a June day under my feet.
These I can understand; transient, irrelevant.

There is no more grief in these than dust. Shoes shuffle them.

Winds rip them from the sidewalk and store them away in poems.

I glance at the ceiling now.
Can all these shadows, dancing on my paper, have fallen like a plaster surrender?

Do they evacuate your poems for mine when the wind is reading?: silos of remembrance trailing shadows of Carcassonne?

NOT FUNGUS, NO, NEVER THAT!

I am no longer bothered when that rotten stump breaks out in another human ear.

Already four have fitted themselves neatly against the bark.

Two, nestled at fork of roots, cup skywards.

A cluster of six in miniature sprouted only yesterday. I wonder if the rain has any bearing on their size. They are so delicate, those small ones, and apparently quite attentive!

I merely observe, go out there and catch up with any that might have planted themselves in the dark by stealth.

I have finally come to accept them, even more than that, enjoy them. They are company for me, you know.

They make me feel interesting.

SCHUYKILL WEATHER

With the air sagging from its fastenings all around you, and your head sticking up there to prop it, there is no chance for your knees at all. Your hands sulk, drooping from their roots at wrists, like sodden maple leaves that drip aphids and itches.

It is all yours to walk the weather's weight with your feet.
Your clothes insult you. You could bite the first slam of a restless door.

The atmosphere nags, committed to a grudge it holds, like a threat of blackmail, or a pistol between the ribs.

IMAGINE YOUR GUITAR

Flinching, tremulous; tweaked like strings, an instant oscillates and worries air. I imagine your guitar as tension strung to no rigid frame, no bowl of resonance, but as an arbitrary scale you pinch against the stars, once wince at a time.

The zenith flutters.

THE RAUCOUS HOUR

The whiskery tip of a russet tail flicked out from under the sofa bed.

Small wonder!

Last night at eleven thirty Beethoven's tally-ho Emperor cleared two chair backs, a book-piled table and the northernmost window-sill straight through the lowered sash.

A searching broom has yet to dislodge the fox.

The ceiling releases another knob of plaster, which strikes a glass and breaks its.

The floor sinks wetly to my tread after Handel's Niagara.

Underneath or overhead, next door apocalypse explodes late every evening, and early Sunday mornings to awaken God.

THE EVENING FISH

The fish that a clean dusk lures between the stripped twigs of television thickets and chimneys choked with crooked pipes that stagger in coolie hats or balance the rotation of spheres and the creaking mobility of ventilator sculpture, this once were out too early, and let the sun flash them from brick and rusted iron, strike coral rhythms from their sides and shrill an agony of silver from their fins, this once, when preceding evenings had allowed only one explorer to rest, nose tangent to an upright and tail a perpetual ripple to secure a moment of stationary suspension, this once, before the blue strengthened and broke out in a lively rash of scattered stars; well before the cat returned with feathers in his whiskers, the same that so recently had silkened the overlap assumed to be scales, blazing from the swarms that streamed from cupolas dropped over water tanks, this once before fillets of feathers seeded the city wind for trawlers.

SO THERE, DESCARTES!

I have had all the time in the universe to examine that table, the rug,

the chair,

and still I am not convinced of his departure.

But he has disappeared. He took his feet away when he removed his head, shirt, tie and coat; everything he was above the table.

 Maybe he left his feet in front of the door of his top floor room.

I shall waste no time in climbing all those stairs to see.

 He should be behind that unreplenished cup. An obstinate fold of his overcoat laps down darkly

at the side of his chair.

I would never allow myself to interfere with the reveries of a secret agent, who could be the muse, the saboteur subversive and obvious as always.

SUBWAY EXIT

It had to be he.

He was always like that;
always going away;

always his long familiar back;
his giveaway gait,

going,

while keeping his face where he was going, keeping his identity untapped,

just as he was at this moment; ten steps upward and ahead of me, keeping his face in sun and street for recognition.

Was I to crush against the wall and pass him?

to call out his name as if to spin him backward?

or watch his back receding — if it were he?

SUSPENSE FOR DAYS

Is it

or is it not going to open up and when if it does?

This

I have asked myself

when the steeple riffles slightly at the base, loosens its sheath of brick, and lets it hang in folds as if about to slam against the sky as basin of a raised umbrella.

Much too often just about to, like preliminary nasal tugs announcing sneeze!

STRIKE TWO

I have just replaced the mirror with an echo, which fills the pallor of its absence with a perfect fit.

Switching from sight to sound required no radical adjustment.

Soon I no longer looked there to see if I was being watched, and went about my business, throwing the wall a word instead of the usual nervous glance and got the word back, slightly altered,

instead of the image which the old glass smudged and blurred as if from constant indecision as to how I should have been reported.

Now
there is greater likelihood of an honest duplication, but when the time comes for my ear to be continually alert to any silence from the wall, not for gratuitous comment, but for the possibility that I am being overheard, I shall remove the echo, as I did the mirror, and leave the wall a blank for shadows, at the risk of being grabbed.

SUSTAINED ENCHANTMENT

You were always old in there. Way back behind accretions of protective selves, wise;

sunken inside your own dark oracle, on which your volatile awareness floated, took fire when any particle, spun off from my unraveling vexation, merged with the frost that streaked a moon life through your somber and forgiving patience, like the cirrus bridging the conspiratorial circuits that pervade your hair; intrigues among arcana. You were always intolerably beautiful in there.

I fought you much too often for my health.
My nerves screamed
in unison,
 still do and will until I am caught back in my ageless home, somewhere between the dawn and darkness

in your Satori.

THE SOUND OF THE TINKLING CYMBALS

They are here again today.
Their fingertips are alive with buttercup bells.
Patterns cut out of sunlight play over the flowers that dance in the winking of their hands.

Hear them, Jerusalem!
Already the air is rain waiting, pausing upon its patience until the end of the celebration through which the children, peering above the sills of their eyes, are asking if I am harmful.

Is it not foolish of them when their chants cling to the corners of my darkness after their dance is done?
My rooms are still and weighted, thick with the heather on the breath of the gods, and all night long the invitation of the fire in the bells.

These are my brothers who counsel me in the singing of unknown birds.

IN THE CAUSE OF JUSTICE

Nothing popped up out of that walnut

at him when he split it open.

Nothing diminutive shrilled an insult.
Nothing spat
when he crushed the shell.

Nothing at all untoward.

Nothing exploded.

The shell was not even empty.

Boycott walnuts!

A CUP OF COFFEE

When you lift the sash of your window, up goes wherever you are behind the upper one, and it remains there, writhing with apple boughs, galloping with a headlong meadow nowhere, while being its usual self in motion.

But outside and underneath, my present situation spies on you.

Fire escapes scuttle under a roofing of heavily drifted snow, climb into tree tops, or harass the base of a village spire, and you sip your coffee, not yet willing to recognize the texture of the wind that cools it, staring at what you expect to see, which actually rattles above your head, trapped between two plates of glass like the twin fake lenses, composed of the business of ants, that were framed into spectacles for Salvador Dali.

Then, when you slam your window shut, the meadow and orchard telescope into your recent illusion, driving both it and mine to their customary distances, and once again the fire escapes threaten my neighbors' windows.

THE IRON URGE

It is a night of steel.
The stars sting and refuse to desist.
A smirk of a moon has been newly sharpened. You can hear it ring when a surreptitious breeze scratches its back against the crescent's curve.

It is the kind of a night that grasps both of your shoulders and wrenches them; a night when your body shrinks inside its coat and loses contact with its lining; when the sky is pallid with the pearled frost of arrested breath.

The moon stirs, shrieks distantly beyond the crags, but the high profile of the head and beak of the eagle, emerging from the pinnacle, is silent.

The mountain is slow in the process of hatching. It is cutting a predator instead of a tooth, and the three eggs, bleakly gleaming from their nest on the balustrade, freeze inward from the crackling surfaces of shells, through pyrite yolks, to agate verbs, unwinged and aging.

A TRYST BENEATH A BIRD HOUSE

You have gone up into your head, and have vanished completely. What can be going on up there? The lights have been awakened all at once.

The ladder which you must have climbed, no longer props your chin. Someone must have drawn it up. Are the birds healthy? Are they eating well?

I just saw two indigo buntings hurtle out of both your eyes in unison, like simultaneous bullets.

It must be fun to do that, especially when your finger flips the right switch unconsciously, and off they go;

or when a gull sails out of your mouth.

It seems so easy.
Maybe everything is easier up there.
I never got that far.

I stayed behind, down here hoping, at the low end of your neck, to meet you at your collarbone.

THE BLIGHT

He never sits still.
Undisclosed business sends him on mysterious errands out of the room and back, then out again, but if he is unable to climb over human legs or ease his energy between the chairs, he will thrust his crooked smile across your shoulder and rattle it against your ear.

He extracts individuals from a crowd, drags them into corners and murmurs darkly that the moon is rising that the lawn needs mowing and that he knows the cube root of 22,056

(and you know what that means!)

He proposes to announce it at the next meeting of the Board of Estimate if his victim refuses to give him the window at the second story front the fireplace in the parlor the column at the northeast corner of the porch the Wedgwood spittoon and the smaller of two stuffed walruses as embellishments for the cardboard palace he intends to build, and through which he has vowed to ride a bicycle in pilgrimage past all his mirrors, leaving behind him a votive offering to every image of his suit and tie.

If indeed the Board of Estimate has not been coerced to snore for a week through solutions of quadratic equations, or the swimming pool with the Picasso mosaic at the bottom has not been filled to the top with tar in excess of the truckful which has clogged the chimney.

HOME CAN BE ANYWHERE

They come in clots; the abused buildings with boarded windows, the empty shops and bars that barely function.

Between them, squashed houses sink in lots, frantic with the dance of Shiva, that suffers from a sick burlesque of scrub pines, or with deciduous runts, whose fat bouquets of leaves fuss in their discontent against indifferent walls.

All these along the edge of a fed-up ocean, dabbing at the shore by habit, whose beaches, three parts soil to one part sand, breathe an unlikely green against their raw sienna.

A fossil, still alive in squalor? The crisp, blue buses rocket through its veins, carrying no advertising, even for miracles,

but the proud plaques, in every park, weep the guilt loose from the grooves of letters, that spell the count of those who died in two World Wars, Korea and Vietnam for Staten Island, but never note Staten Island's death.
 Be sure of that!

They burnt the certificate that made that real, and lie about it brazenly in air conditioned buses. Home can be anywhere at all, they say, even on Staten Island, and they mean it.

SOME DAY A SUDDEN CRAVING

Old blood goes bad.

Only freshly siphoned blood leaks new life into veins, and so, at the weekend he comes home with bottled refuse blood to feed the roses:

white, with no blush rising. Innocence of Borgia, the Pontiff's kin;

thorns tucked away in thicket leaves. Beguiling kitten roses. Claws straining in velvet lairs.

Old blood goes bad in storage, but sated with mild hallucinogens, his roses thirst for something real.

They smile at him.

THE BRAIN WALKS CLOSE BEHIND

Your face precedes you. By some three inches the business section follows it, keeps it positioned for recovery should panic speed it into partnership and catch it unprepared, as when a word of greeting snags in the stateliness of its passage and arcs the crevice between both halves in front of your ears.

So often I have seen the ritual your nose and cheekbones leading their high commands; a triumph of bowsprit, an elevation of reliquary. presentation of armorial claims, while eyeless and with folded hands an attendant animates or wears it, until a stare or a word too strong to be trapped between the lid and the box springs abrupt collision and catches your largo summarily, with or without intention, and you are all of a heap in yourself at once. It happens often, but drops no mileage from the march, invalidates no prestige.

ANCESTRAL VISION

Now your recurrent father surfaces; from crypt of dream, from all humanity's first oracle holds court, transfiguring the face behind your beard. And who are you? Priest, Hierophant?
Scholar of Akashic scripts?
Our common ancestor who counsels elves? Confessor to all innocents who seek the Grail?

Your youth denies it.
Your casual eyes conflict in seeming with an intensity that holds them captive to a cosmic wisdom.

Are you gone up in smoke, leaving this august and learned personage custodian of your body, or are you host to a more aggressive spirit, shuffling both immortalities inside your skin to justify one ego, or are you saint in fact, fiction painting your identity on subtle truth? And what is that?

THIS CERTAIN QUAINTESS

Good gray Grand-Daddy, stuffed into the clutter of a room too small for emotional surprises, rummages contentedly through psychic bric-a-brac and bits of this and that left over from a padded century; a peacock sadly used by years; an aquatint of the Prater; fussy doilies everywhere; a mixed bouquet of dried leaves and dead grass; a sculptured marble clock, wriggling with ormolu; the smell of dust-thick portieres, all spilling from an era spawned by such minutiae, while somewhere underneath the papers on the desk an old id waters at the eyes; while above the circling time an Oedipal triangle holds hands in gilt clinging to sensuous lead; while in the basket by the hearth an infantile libido sneezes; while in the wideness of outside the oily spread and sprawl of a squirming light-show oozes from being into nothing and back again, spelling the name of Sartre on cockroach carapace of Now.
Would it were Jean-Paul Jones instead!
But nothing ever seems quite simple, even names.

This is our heritage, which never was completely serviceable, being a hamper full of hand-me-downs, knitted conundrums, whose soiled and simple answers glut the button box, mementos of the Franco-Prussian
War and memoranda on the thrust of birth.

What shall we do with all dear Dr. Freud's accumulation of pressed infancies? Now that we have become so long accustomed to them, how can we bear to trade off for uncertainties, this certain quaintness?

KEEPING THE WINDOW CLOSED

The last time
I opened the window the moon got in,

streaked through between the sill and sash and plunged into the mirror.

It stuck there.
Now I cannot get it out from between the mercury and the glass.

Look in the mirror any time of day or night, and there the moon is, guarding the absence of your image and gloating serenely, I resent it;

the stars too,
that were sucked behind the speed of moon into the parlor,

where they roosted on anything and crackled, flared, went out, then flared again,

and vanished.
That...bothers me.

THE SUMMER'S FINAL SEASON

It was vulnerable; that deep green dent in the range of mountains. Spring and Autumn roused watersheds that made an unbroken mudhole of the glowing fields. Winter brought avalanching snow, and ice in crevices, that slid off cliffsides, sending them to plough the steeps that once had held them, or sprang the gangwar boulders, sending them down in leaping triumph, end over end, to the certain demolition of anything that blocked their way, Summer sank down among the peaks, or burned high in unmoving air above the village, which somehow had crystallized there, even under these conditions, and had remained intact for centuries with a repair here, a patch there; bright with whitewash and weeping thatch, hard edged in a loose geometry of clusters. The Cross on the church spire agonized even the far-off observer's eye.

Sheep mourned and roosters cheered. Laundry danced on Mondays behind the kitchens.
Children repeated hereditary rites in the rutted roads, but still, now, in the cauldron of Leo, a black smudge of no disturbing size, hung as if appreciably distant above the village; hung motionless, gained density. grew blacker, larger, as if in slow and regular descent. All was untainted around it.
Heat dazzled in the dooryards. Barns and haycocks quivered in the haze, and the days drowned in their nightfalls. The moon took over, chilling around the blot that never scattered, never shredded or shifted from its post above the huge house of civic affairs, yet thickened with each hour's weighting.

It was a dream, of course, a night's glimpse bitten from a long succession of the same in a history of suspense. Routine had long ago numbed everyone. One day the cloud would liberate its cargo, would tire of its darkness and release it on unwavering sunlight, or else would plummet like a stone on target, bringing both contents and container, if they were separate, crashing through the rooftops in this thimbleful of motions.

But after so many abortive catastrophes had loomed once and had been forgotten, what difference if a deviant threat imperiled this tedious splendor!

THE CAPRICORN TAPESTRY

Out there in the darkness bushes wink up at him.

For us, they are enlivened by fireflies, but to him they are cover for marauders. The telephone sits guileless, on the table, saying nothing.

Let its silence be tapped, for silence listens to unspoken guilt.

Call out the goon squad!

The one-man vigil across the street, crashes through drawn blinds and the message on his swaying placard, in the ice-blue of unwavering light, reads its repeated accusation from every mirror.

a sinister white sphere, now resting by the herbaceous border, has been lit with leprous malignancy by the moon, and is bound to explode.

Even the surface of the moon is scouted by astronauts, looking down here, plotting something.

Order them back! Quickly!

Throw them a banquet, Anything, to keep them from getting up there to spy on the chimney.

Who knows what danger may seep down the flue.

THE LODGER

The sky herds its clouds, at least on two sides of this floor and ceiling.
A modest wall secures their hopefully stable relationship. The bed dozes, but not the comb,
stood nearly on its head, which teeters on one corner gleefully and which, thank God,
though scaled to the universe of an almost floor-to-ceiling goblet, dents the mattress only slightly.

A match from that same dimension lies regrettably slack on the carpet, its wood relaxed almost to the pliancy of twine.
The wardrobe, all of glass, except for its frame, has been scrubbed to the cleanliness of nothing at all, and proves itself to be an admirable container of nothing. It is a good room, a small and well swept corner of experience, which just this week is entertaining some random items from a somewhat mismatched awareness, but does it matter, when you come down to it?

The clouds are purposeful in their drive and the carpet is spotless.

I would never leave this room at all, except for the rent, and that is reckoned only by the type who darkens the exquisite blue in that glass with wine.

SHADOW FAKER

It can hardly be easy to summon shadows after sunrise, to pack them in concentrate about your waking, molded to your appearance, yet that is what you drag out of bed every morning,

When you plunge your clouded consciousness into the bath, the water undoubtedly forces unattached masses of darkness upward and about your head.

for now you have shaken the splendor of night from about your ears, after entering, a tall drift of coolness, into the field of fluorescent inspection, still reminiscent of a slender rise of winter smoke.

How much of you squanders your reality in keeping you a fake hallucination?

AQUILA

It is difficult for me to speak the audacity of your images into my descriptions of you, as it must have been also for you to loosen and tumble the side of a mountain, before you eased yourself out of the peak that hatched you, while blinking at the bleached sky and the great fins of snow behind you as the moon bounced its replicas against your pride and retrieved them for bent reminders.

There was then as now, the same experimentation with the muscles of back and shoulder, the same tentative archings of unmanageable wings, which rose again, even though completely exhausted; the same crane of your head to the zenith and the same attempts to whet both your beak and eyes against the moon, as if in anticipation of that extended gaze that leaps for the sun and grasps it as now. But then, the process was longer and far more cautious. For now, as in two hand grasp you set the lectern between your purpose and your audience, the high heft of your wings is definite, their grandeur as chilling as the night that willed you from its granite, and your lashes take fire from the cargo stolen from the sun behind them. The flint ridges rise in blades from your shoulders, and the drone of recycled formulae from several years' storage in this one room, is broken as the eagle crashes against the ceiling. There the spell is terminated. Night hardens into deafness, drowning.

COMPANIONS

These boots, familiar, are wearied with the weight of walking.
Bare toes peep out through leather as the boots transform to feet

The feet crack with drying and the boots are aching.
Standing before the fireplace these boots, these feet become as one and wait there patiently to be thrown out together.

The owner will have to do without either boots or feet; the feet before they crack and stiffen and the boots have flattened arches.

THE SORCERER'S MOON

On a patch of sod at the forking of two roads there grows a tree;
its leaves compact and black, in contrast with the woods behind it, which cradles the infant moon.

the same moon that vibrates from the mirror in your absence; the same moon that soars beyond the mountain peak that disgorges a granite eagle; the same moon drenching a meadow in which a giant wine glass swirls the fragments of cloudlets in its gullet; the same which our hands would touch in search for keenness burning, as if with the intensity of cold, the anger of outrageous summer.

SKY HANGER

According to the instructions I had to jump, I did from the ledge at the top of a mountain into nothing and plunged a short shock downwards, then steadied upon the air.

The mountain backed away from me and merged behind me with all its brothers and I was where I was alone from a wide wing dangling, thinking of the absurdity of my moccasins

when hanging from skies that pulled in tall heaps of blue above me, facing a wall of hills that bucked and heaved at times on their line of march along the valley or jostled with one another while down some thousand feet below were dairy farms resorts, spires, silos, an eyecup lake, or a country road, unmindful of a speck that eddied where I was, naked in my fear of Up and Down and of Out to Every Side in all their vastness.

ADVANCE UPON CANAAN

We were a long time coming: Ours was no Exodus, but a continued coming: not as the dunes creep, soon to be anchored by grass, scrambling across them, not as the waves which are always coming, but never arrive.

As burrs fasten to pelts, as pods on one wing circling, and nearly invisible, slowed and halted by fitfulness of wind, we came upon Canaan and took root in the midst of the brush, grew up through thicket and resistance of indigenous tribes until we were grown enough to look over the dunes toward our Country and presentiment of our City, at one time Babylon, at another Jerusalem.

In both home and in the wilderness we shall sing the song of our lady of revelations in a strange land.

Above our heads in the sky the wheel turns, still turns and is stilled: all wings and eyes seeing and seen, moving and motionless completion of ourselves at our exit as at our beginning, packed thick with good and guilt

At one with our fathers, judges, kings, prophets, back before realization in constant rotation over the top of the hill, from which we shall see the land we have yet to conquer, though we may not attain it in our ration of life.

The dunes come but they are anchored by grass.
The sea is forever coming, but never arrives.
Ours was a continued coming over the ages to Canaan beneath the chariot wheels which have yet to come.

LEAVINGS

Those legs you left here still stick straight out across the doorway. Some day they are going to trip me, and that spread of hand and forearm pressed against a panel, probably to brace a leaning shoulder and somehow in brightness —

(that kitchen light has always dazzled me) but not in shoulder. Oh no, No arm there. Just an aggressive jutting from between the coats.

Then that chevron fringe of beard without a face to hang it dangles for a moment in the mirror; one hand wrings a clutch of fingers.
There is always a merry crackling in the corner when that happens, always beside the refrigerator.
And no one left to snoop for beer?

An eye rolled to the side comes on, goes off. A bent back at my desk, a strain of shirt across the shoulders: highlights which the desk lamp caught and lost.

And how about that foot and trouser to the knee, supported by a sturdy chair?
There ought to be a knee bent with an arm across it.

But everything ends off abruptly, like sentences that people start and suddenly abandon.
They should come back some day to haunt their speakers like the spare parts left around to litter up my rooms since you decentralized.

My God, man, will you never pull yourself together? what sort of stripped down suggestion of the rest of you is badgering someone else?

THE LISTENING ROOM

Green chill awaits me.
A hard unripening roundness daily expands, encroaching on my absences. Only a thread of floor remains to me for sidling to that pinched corner where I keep my soul.

Tonight I shall return to fetch it. I shall inch the door open upon the increasing pressure, the insidious glow, and fling my keys inside beneath that patch of ceiling, breathed green, to which the floor replies in kind.

Let them talk green at the thickest of that tart fragrance that exudes from a seedless core, while I rejoice as the spring lock rejects me.

Ours fastens on mine no longer

WHERE WILL IT ALL BEGIN?

Night
Fritters its life away.

The dawn is working on another morning.

letting it ooze at its least in dribbles through inky fingers.

That's stingy;
flap both hands awake and let the spatter fly, or better dump it all of a lump in the ocean and see what happens.

THE WATCHER AWAKENED

The sweep of an eyebrow measures the breadth of whiteness, still unbroken by writing.

I did not draw it there; it loiters above the area, then drifts away.

If the wind brought it, bobbing on the viscid current of time,
night
anticipated my delusions.

The eye beneath it blossoms on the paper and re-routes my pen.

CAT'S CRADLE

It is probably all tinsel and radiator paint:
this prodding with eyes;
this tickling with the edge of a smile; the appearance of nearly paranormal knowledge in the intensity of your gaze. A rehearsal, perhaps, or something you wear to parties,

 I tell myself, after so many feints at offers in an atmosphere hypnotic with intimacy; glances slipped to me like bribes, like joints,

 which you know
will never be taken;
smiles that might well be stolen from you if I believed them, and that limp, leftover hand on the couch which is waiting for something.

Nothing that I would do, of course,
and nothing you want to happen.

WATER BABY

I seem to have you limp in my hands.

Like water
you are hard to hold.

An arm leaks stealthily down through my fingers.

A leg, flung over my thumb, kicks convulsively, almost pulling the rest of you after it, out and over,

and then my forefinger;
goes through your eye.
Your nose sinks inwards;

I wish you would stiffen up for once, bone yourself back to some semblance of a human body, and lend me an arm that bends only at the elbow.

I go on wishing.

MY COUSIN IN VERTICAL ORBIT

She was so neat about it.
She slid head downward into the chimney and skimmed the floor from the fireplace to the window. Non-stop and out.

Then up over eaves and back down in swan-dive through the parlor.

The last time the rug went with her.

It will home, grime thickened at her next sweep through, and I, apparently, will be cursed with a night of numbering beers against the underbellies of her revolutions, or of strolling among the fireflies at the garden's end, for the best view of her backward curve of spine, as she arches the ridgepole cleanly between two lightning rods, and drives the bats as crazy as human beings.

She was neat about it. Even with her measurements, she negotiated the bore of the flue, emerging as plump as ever, never having dislodged a gobbet of soot, spotted her dress, or unhooked her coiffure, but three were many times more than enough of that.

YOU NEVER NOTICE

At the street crossing
I took you by the crook of your arm.
With the faintest sound of ripping, it came off, and I was left holding it.

You never noticed,

but continued to gash the air with your face as you shoved it ahead of you to the opposite sidewalk.

Your mind ran no longer beside us; it has started up an idea or two in an alley and was off in pursuit.

Small swarms of letters clustered in wriggling blots against the sky. Your eyes worried at their spasms of rearrangement, squinted apparent meanings from several spellings.

So often you leave me with the stem of a conversation clamped in my teeth, a rhythm of breathing in the telephone, an arm.

OPTICAL ILLUSIONS

My bones are bare now; gnawed down by moonlight and picked clean.

They are flashes,

a scarce width more than flickerings of recognition.

When you sort them, they know your fingers;

the silver bowl,
the icy water,

their convulsed appearance on its surface, and in your hunger.

ENOUGH OF THIS

Shut up, old wound.
If your mouth must stay open.
let it laugh;

dry cackles locked together like knitted burrs, lodged in the scruff of memory, and let the words that fester in it terminate before shape catches them up in your thread of a throat

Clamp your gaping truth on quiet.

BAD COMPANY

If a thick, green discharge issues from underneath his fingernails and stains the carpet, and if the teeth in his smile gleam solidly with stainless steel, a bad evening is probably ahead of you, if not a frightful one.

If she brings in a dazzle of chandelier lustres and a stiletto laugh;
if her heels strike sparks from the parquetry and her hair retracts visibly into her scalp, meditate, if you can, upon an inexpensive lawyer, and fire insurance,

or if the two of them arrive together as a team and vanish upon the moment of appearance, scrutinize the fireplace, then if any sort of ankles and shoes whatever hang into it from the chimney,

saturate the whole house with the stench of cabbage (even if simulated) and take your leave.

Close the door smartly.
Hang some bacon from the knob, and run like hell.

IT MUST BE A JOKE

Your face has slimmed and twisted, one eye exploded into the center of a spider's wheel;

Your nose has been smudged from sight, your mouth slipped sideways and drawn crooked.

How have you become so distorted when my face is missing from behind your shoulder;

when you clutch at yourself with both arms across from me at the table;

when there is no mirror?

WINDFALL

Greenbacks slithering across my desk.
They rustle. Gouged from envelopes drifting into piles.

Sticking,
wilted and crumpled; some few torn.
They are mounting. I can hardly count them. They continue coming.

Where shall I put tomorrow's payload since today's still must be organized, how handle them? Bind them in packs of twenty and press them down to fit in tidy packets?

Leaves are drifting into herds and from the boughs of abandoned trees in silence silver coins are falling.

DOWN MEADOW SLOPE

Look down the moonsweep to a march of spruce and see your own form naked,
 dancing:
how fireflies come and go as if from between your ribs how grasses bristle through your shins how you stick on the twigs of a crouching bush as if you were a twist of fog.

You are!
but what is lacking there tonight that seems to make you real?

END OF AN ERA

Victory fallen from the Arch in Grand Army Plaza, Brooklyn

You would never be satisfied with conciliation;
deploring peace talks you would press your demands for bombs.

Anyone with as many sharp spikes and excrescences to embellish a helmet as you have could only cry for combat.

Look how you have incited your horses to rear and plunge as you lash them to leaping from the top of the arch.

You have long been pleased to deafen daily with those trumpets in your ears. Life without a continuing clamor would be unproductive for you.
You will have to be Queen Tumult to exist, to fulfill your imagined destiny.

But as of this date you have gone too far. A step back (always a misdemeanor in your code) to an extra thrust of your highly unnecessary sword has unstepped you and you have been poured head down in a tumble of scrap metal cast as your garments from the rear of your chariot, secured still by some obstinate remnant of uncorroded bronze to your heels, with your foolish sword menacing pedestrians below you in Grand Army Plaza.

So much for you,
Senora Machismo!

SOUTHWARD RUNNING

It is all as it should be;
he shall soon be entering from the North as I have often seen him, running

his right arm lifted high above his head flourishing a five-branched candelabrum its small fires flattened by his speed and bright with the wine-sharp pallor of a city evening against the peach glow of the arching lamps

running

as if with the pressure of news to spring upon the ear and eye in sparks in mantra.

ignoring questions friends and onlookers swept aside slight curling at the edges of a skimmed milk moon and all the sky widened to five more senses and dimensions,

running!

VANDALISM

A smart bite of gravel which you dropped in my boot and which gnawed at the stance of my determination or a muscle rendered useless by a bruise;

bullet holes pocked in the lid of my grand piano after your last invasion of my privacy of mind.

These I charge with damage to my self esteem not you with your fuse and matches.

ANOTHER SEASON

In bygone years the sunlight bit the buildings just this way in this season by late afternoon.

Now every one of them has come to life with all its faces, voices, emotions and events so clearly that they all but injure me.

Bricks still glow almost as with some certain light within them.

In country towns a new paint in pastels takes on an unsuspected vigor as if to say,

Here I am.

So many budding Autumns heaped up upon one another in piles like flaming leaves recall as many other times and places as music and as many dead beginnings.

THE PRIVILEGED MOMENTS: PUBLISHING BARBARA A. HOLLAND

The poems in this volume were first published by The Grim Reaper and The Poet's Press in the years 1973 through 1975. First, we issued a sampler of the overall work as the chapbook, Autumn Wizard. Later, the work appeared in two chapbooks as Crises of Rejuvenation, Volumes 1 and 2. Several reprints followed, but the integral work has now been out of print for many years.

It was evident from the start that this was no ordinary collection of poems. When I first met Barbara Holland in 1971 I was immediately struck by her forceful language — rocky, granitic, yet sinuous — and by the quirky, bizarre and sometimes hilarious images she was able to conjure. When I discovered that many of the poems were inspired by the visual world of the paintings of Rene Magritte, the Belgian Surrealist, one of my favorite artists, I was hooked.

The original volumes of this poetic cycle did not contain specific references to Magritte other than the title poem, and two of my own cover designs that emulated Magritte in concept. The first cover showed an apple setting over a seascape, clearly a tribute to Magritte. The second volume had a line drawing of a rose extracting its color from a blood transfusion, an illustration of one of Barbara's poems.

In retrospect, I think we were remiss in not making the Magritte connection more clear. Readers who have never seen Magritte's paintings have enjoyed these poems. But experienced together with a perusal of the painter's work, the works take on extra resonance. The reader gains a common visual and epistemological experience with the poet and can thus participate more readily in her flights of fantasy. In my own case, I found that the Magritte paintings inspired me to render my own impressions, reactions and interpretations into poems as well. Sometimes, Barbara and I wrote poetic dialogues with the mysterious Magritte world as our shared take off point.

What is surrealistic in the context of these poems? Magritte's work differs substantially from what I shall call, for lack of a better term, the work of "hard" Surrealists. He poked fun at manifestos and nearly always rooted his paintings in reality. Where a Dali landscape is often completely alien, and where other modernists even abandon traditional representation altogether, Magritte's paintings depict the strange and inexplicable in a realistic, painterly manner, centering on the cityscapes and landscapes of Paris, Belgium, the European forest and countryside, mountains and sea-shore. Rows of town houses line up in tedious splendor, their windows reflecting or capturing proper clouds. Magritte's sea and sky are photographically perfect, except when intruded upon by interloping impossibilities.

In "The Empire of Light," for example, the artist presents a house, a garden wall, some trees and a street lamp. The lamp casts light and shadows out over the lawn and it is reflected in a pond. All is dark under the trees. An ordinary, realistic scene, depicted with amazing subtlety in the gradations of tones of light on the underside of the trees.

The element of the Surreal enters when we look at the sky above the scene. It is bright, noontime blue! The scene below is night, above is high noon. The pond, of course, should be blue as the sky, and the trees should be lit from all directions by refracted sunlight. Magritte blends the underlit trees and their foliage into a silhouette against the blue sky, a masterpiece of illusion. The observer knows that something is “mysterious” or “wrong” about the painting, but its photographic realism fools the eye.

Other Magritte paintings are more blatantly Surreal. An eye stares out of the center of a slice of ham. Three moons perch in the limbs of a tree. An eagle hatches out of a jagged mountain peak. Household objects and a lion litter the edge of a road.

Magritte admired mystery stories about secret agents, and was fascinated with the works of Edgar Allan Poe. He created a visual world in which mysterious objects, such as little round sleigh bells, French horns, lions, and bowler hats, appear again and again on beaches, in forests, or in city streets. Or, a familiar room and its objects are petrified, or a sky is rendered as a stack of cubes.

This combination of realism and the mysterious makes Magritte unlike most other Surrealists. The same factor makes his work much more accessible to average viewers. There is a special appeal for poets, who are always looking for ways to turn the everyday into the mysterious.

Barbara Holland is not a “Surrealist” in the literary sense. There is no randomness, no impulse toward Dadaist fist-shaking. The ambiguities of meaning, the shattering of form and syntax that run rampant in literary Surrealism have no place in her writing. Like Magritte with his photographic style, Barbara writes in plain English, often in a narrative that could easily be read as prose to the unwitting listener with poem-phobia. Her voice speaks in complete sentences, tightly packed clauses, and unambiguous meaning.

The world of Barbara Holland, then, is the real one. The twist is simply that impossible things happen in her world. Roses drink bottled blood, tree stumps sprout human ears, unaccompanied crutches stride the avenues, and a knife appears in the poet’s back as a permanent ornament. She writes with clarity and wit about each brand of impossibility.

How much Magritte does the reader have to know to appreciate these poems? The answer is — surprisingly little. Browse through a book of Magritte’s work to get a feel for the visual world, and you are ready for most of what Barbara deals out. In fact, most of these poems are not specifically about any particular Magritte painting. Magritte merely provides the template that Barbara superimposes over her New York turf. She sees her urban setting as if through the canvasses of the master, and tells us what she sees.

I interviewed Barbara about the poems in Crises of Rejuvenation when we were preparing the 1986 edition. Following are the notes we made about some of the poems that do spring from actual Magritte paintings, presented here for those who might take pleasure in reading the poems against the paintings. Some other passing thoughts about the inspiration or intention of certain poems also emerged from the conversations, and are they repeated here so that the reader may benefit from the background information.

PERSONAL VALUES was provoked by the painting “Les Valeurs personnelles” (1952) which depicts a room full of oversize objects. A comb and brush and a bar of soap overwhelm a normal sized bed, while the room’s wallpaper depicts a Surreal sky and clouds. Another poem, THE LODGER, also uses this painting as a taking-off-point.

A STREET THROUGHOUT THE YEARS depicts a repeated dream that never attains a conclusion, a door that is never reached.

VERNAL EQUINOX introduces the concept of petrified objects, people and even emotions that Barbara has adopted from Magritte. Paintings by Magritte that come to mind are “The Song of the Violet” and “Souvenir de Voyage III.”

In INTIMATIONS and, later, THE EVENING FISH, sky and ocean are interchanged at dusk wherein fish fly among the television antennae and chimney tops. You have to see the sunsets over Greenwich Village through a succession of seasons to appreciate how true this is to the neighborhood where we all lived.

The dinner date in AN ABOMINABLE BREAKFAST, Barbara tells me, is like one of Magritte’s petrified bourgeoisie.

When Barbara empathized with a nephew in a cast for a broken leg, she began fantasizing about a pair of unpeopled crutches, perhaps the most bizarre automata ever. LOUDER THAN LIFE depicts their adventures.

The title poem, CRISES OF REJUVENATION, refers to several key Magritte paintings. The poem centers, though, on a series of perverse paintings in which Magritte painted objects and then put incorrect names under them, such as a tumbler of water called “l’Orage (Storm)” in “La Clef des Songes (The Key of Dreams).” There is also the famous painting, “Ceci n’est pas une pipe (This is not a pipe).”

Barbara wondered about the origin of the cubed sky shown in paintings such as “La legende doree,” and here is her theory, made by a sorcerer in MY OLD FRIEND, THE SORCERER.

WHO GOES FIRST is a literal reaction to the painting titled “Ready-Made Bouquet.”

THE BEST OF ALL POSSIBLE WORLDS was provoked by one of the most haunting paintings of the 20th Century, Magritte’s “Castle of the Pyrenees,” which depicts a castle atop an egg-shaped rock that floats serenely over a seascape. Epics could be written about that one painting.

THE INEVITABLE KNIFE is a masterpiece of paranoia fit for one of Magritte’s trailed secret agents. When Barbara read this, she twisted about, looking for the knife in her back which she could neither see nor extricate.

Those seeking to explain poets’ visions as the result of drugs will be only slightly satisfied to see that Barbara can transform bleak Sixth Avenue into a circus after having only three cups of my infamous Lapsang Sou-chong tea, in HIGH ON THREE CUPS OF TEA The poem contains one of the most wondrous streaks of alliteration in all of Barbara’s poems as well.

The eagle hatching out of the mountain in “The Domaine of Arnheim” — itself a mysterious reference to a story by Poe — provoked several poems, including AS ONE POSSESSED and, later, THE IRON URGE and AQUILA.

Sun, moon and stars occasionally get stuck in window panes, mirrors or treetops in Magritte paintings. This happens in the poem, THE BREAKER. Paintings with this imagery include “September 16th” and “The Banquet.”

AUTUMN WIAZRD is dedicated to Ray Bradbury, the undisputed Lord of October. The “indigo, coral and turquoise” leaves might belong in a Magritte forest.

MIDNIGHT ON THE ESPLANADE is a straightforward explication of the painting “Le Mal du Pays.”

Barbara says of CLOSE CALL FOR THE SECRET AGENT that it represents her pursuit of Magritte’s personality. “I wanted to find out what kind of man he was, and never did figure it out,” she recalled. The poem evokes the many pictures of bowler-hatted men who stare straight at you with masklike, inscrutable faces. Magritte’s paintings, “The Menaced Assassin” and “The Month of Harvest” come to mind.

NOT NOW, WANDERER is contemporaneous with the Magritte poems and certainly shares its mountainous landscapes with those of the painter. But this poem has its origins in Wagner’s Ring Cycle, the paganized operatic setting of the Nibelungenlied, in the figure of Wotan with his single eye, staff and floppy hat. The Wanderer is the name by which the Father of the Gods chooses to be known in the mysterious episode where he tries to block Siegfried’s passage. The “messenger ravens” will be recognized by Wagner fans as the twin birds that signal the imminent assassination of Siegfried. This poem is a passionate song of hopeless, lost, ineluctable passion. It reduces audiences to stunned, purgated silence, so much so that it can be almost unendurable to hear another poem for some long moments afterwards. I am reminded of Mahler’s dictum that five minutes silence should follow the first, funereal movement of his Resurrection Symphony. To hear Barbara read this poem when she was at her peak was one of the great thrills of my poetic life.

TAKE FLIGHT TO MONTREAL! is a personal favorite of mine, for reasons of pure ego. Barbara wrote this after a dinner at The Poet’s Press loft during which I playfully hinted that I was installing some multi-tentacled Lovecraftian monster to protect the premises against burglars. My poem in reply to this one appears side by side with her original in the Grim Reaper anthology May Eve.

Magritte playfully has window panes retain an exterior image even when shattered and leaning against a wall. Here, in THE ITINERANT WINDOW, Barbara has an entire window moving about and winding up in the boughs of a tree. The images trapped in glass also figure in A CUP OF COFFEE.

BEFORE THE BEGINNING is a seascape, very reminiscent of Magritte’s “Le temps menaçant (Threatening weather).”

Rocks from Magritte’s petrified world take on a practical use to punish editors who have the temerity to reject poetry manuscripts in A COVERING LETTER.

In ENTRANCE OF ORIGINS a face turns into rock, somewhat reminiscent of Magritte’s petrified world, but also reminding one of some of Dali’s ideas.

APPORTS evokes a French medieval fortress as an immutable object whose ephemeral shadows move like gypsies from place to place. An enigmatic poem. The origin of NOT FUNGUS, NO, NEVER THAT!, says the poet, “was put in my head by the way fungus looks: noses, chins, ears.”

SCHUYKILL WEATHER, by its title, betrays the poet’s Philadelphia origins.

I IMAGINE YOUR GUITAR was inspired by a display of heat lightning.

In SO THERE, DESCARTES! the secret agent vanishes into thin air — bit by bit. In LEAVINGS, pieces of him linger. The secret agent—the man whose face you never quite see, is also the “you” in SUSTAINED ENCHANTMENT. We suspect, too, that the man always a few steps ahead in SUBWAY EXIT, and YOU NEVER NOTICE, and THE BRAIN WALKS CLOSE BEHIND may be one and the same.

Magritte used umbrellas in some of his work, such as the painting of an opened umbrella with a glass of water on top. In SUSPENSE FOR DAYS a church steeple threatens to open like a parasol.

Mirrors that reflect the wrong images are another familiar Magritte device, in such canvasses as “Les liaisons dangereuses” and “La Reproduction Interdite.” In STRIKE TWO, Barbara has done with Surreal mirrors and then goes into a frenzy over distorted echoes. A tinge of the same marvelous sense of paranoia infects this poem as in THE INEVITABLE KNIFE Later, in KEEPING THE WINDOW CLOSED, the moon and some stars get caught in the parlor mirror. Not “billions and billions” of them, as Carl Sagan would say, but just a few.

When the president of an eminent poetry society just happened to win that group’s $700 prize for “best poem” with an ode “On the Opening of a Walnut,” Barbara was provoked to write her nutty lyric.

In “The Therapist” and a series of related paintings Magritte shows a man who has an oversized bird cage as a torso, which provoked the marvelous poem, A TRYST BENEATH THE BIRDHOUSE.

THE BLIGHT is a character study of a very real character, a small-time con artist who temporarily infected the New York poetry scene in the early to mid-1970s. His hyperactive behavior and grandiose schemes are parodied in this poem.

HOME CAN BE ANYWHERE was provoked by a bus ride through part of Staten Island.

SOME DAY A SUDDEN CRAVING is a true story of a hospital worker who had a novel gardening tip.

In ANCESTRAL VISION an old face suddenly takes on a boyish look and the poet wonders which persona is the real one.

Dr. Freud gets his comeuppance in THAT CERTAIN QUAINNESS. You had to be around in the 1960s and 1970s to see what a grip Freud’s ideas still had. Psychiatrists made a lot of money keeping neurotic, well-heeled patients in a state of total emotional dependence. And it was always about Mommy and Daddy and those repressed desires.

THE SUMMER’S FINAL SEASON concerns a dark cloud hanging over a peaceful village. Everyone pretends it doesn’t exist. Although the poet didn’t intend it, there is something about this poem that, to me, represents the whole of modern Cold War anxiety. The cloud hangs there, waiting to “liberate its cargo” which would “plummet like a stone on target.” For a generation born under the cloud of a nuclear threat, this poem is an unwitting representation of how life just “goes on.”

The real-life paranoia of President Nixon is portrayed in THE CAPRICORN TAPESTRY. Barbara recalled a newscast in which Secret Service agents had scurried on Nixon's orders to disarm a bomb on the White House lawn, which turned out to be a golf ball. If Nixon was made edgy by protesters on the sidewalk, the poet wonders, how would he feel about nosy astronauts staring down at him from the moon?

THE LISTENING ROOM is based on the painting of the same title—possibly one of Magritte's more familiar ones. A large green apple fills almost all the available space in a room. Barbara sent this to me just after I had sent her my ferocious supernatural poem, “Fête.” “A black wedding?” she replied, enclosing this poem and adding, “Well, here's a green divorce!”

THE SORCERER'S MOON is a montage of different images from Magritte, which the reader will recognize from other poems, if not from their constituent paintings.

COMPANIONS, with its bare toes bursting out of a pair of boots is from Magritte's “The Red Model.”

★ ★ ★

This new edition of Crises of Rejuvenation contains a number of poems which were not in the first edition, eleven of them, in fact. By adding them to this edition, we have captured all the poems written by Barbara Holland during the time she was under the nearly full-time spell of merging Magritte's surrealism with the hard realities of life in New York.

It is a privilege to bring this masterful cycle of poems back into print at last. These poems have taken nest in my own consciousness, as they will in yours. You will think of them, of their strange and beautiful images. Even better, you will find that certain phrases become a part of your own vocabulary. You may even find that your perceptions are just slightly altered so that you, too, sit down and write about how the real and unreal collide and invade one another's territory all around you.

The answer to the book's cryptic title lies therein, doesn't it? We grow old and die by seeing things only in the conventional way. We are rejuvenated when we can see things through another sense of dimension, when we can use our imagination so that “names and the objects which they had previously owned divorce for other partners.” It may be mad, but it is glorious!

— Brett Rutherford

Providence, Rhode Island, January 1986/ January 2006